

BOITONS GEORGE TOM

The General Belief is That the British Premier Will Not Affront, in His Speech at Manchester Today, the Labor Party, Which Has Condemned His Foreign Policy—Lloyd George is Expected to Reply to Contention That the Coalition Policy is Responsible for the Country's Bad Trade and Industry—Speech Will Have Strong Influence on Political Crisis That Now Threatens Great Britain.

London, Oct. 13 (By The A. P.).—Curiosity and speculation revolved upon whether the speech delivered today at Birmingham by Austen Chamberlain, government leader in the house of commons, which reveals Mr. Chamberlain as still a convinced and devoted coalitionist and loyal ally to Premier Lloyd George, may be taken as an indication of the line the premier will assume in his address tomorrow at Manchester.

Political circles consider that perhaps the most notable point in Mr. Chamberlain's speech was the declaration that the party of the danger of allowing a labor government to come into power accompanied by the dark shadow of direct action, a casual levy and other similar planks in its platform. His allusion to the laborites is regarded as susceptible of being interpreted in two ways. First, as a warning to the laborites to keep within the lines of policy for the coalition in the event of an appeal to the country, and second, as a mere hint to Mr. Chamberlain's own party which is not declared to be a warning to them to close their ranks and still support the coalition.

The premier, on previous occasions when confronted with difficulty, has represented the labor party as a bolshievetic organization against the country, which must take a firm stand; but critics declare he also has seemed to realize this is a rather risky policy and generally has been back from pursuing it to logical conclusions. His hesitancy, it is asserted, was motivated by plain evidence afforded times out of number, that the British labor party represents communism, and also by the fact that many highly respected economists and financiers have advocated a capital levy as the only effective means through which to deal with the nation's colossal war debt.

Seemingly the general belief here is that the premier will not take the present occasion to affirm the coalition. There is enormous unemployment and a constant scaling down in wages. The labor party is active in the coal mines and industry in Mr. Lloyd George's opinion, which is a contended point in Europe in turmoil. The party advocates a policy of appeasement with both Germany and Russia.

In the most recent by-elections the labor party has had his majorities over the coalitionists, and it is generally believed that the labor party is very strong in the country, especially in the northern industrial districts. The election results are considered by the politicians as not always a reliable index of what will happen in general elections, because party feeling in these districts is not so keen as in a high class city, but it is generally believed that the election results are a warning to the coalitionists to be on their guard.

On general lines, Mr. Chamberlain's speech is considered to have been the strongest possible plea for a continuance of the coalition in some form. For the labor party was prominently mentioned by the labor leaders John R. Clynes, in a speech delivered at Reading tonight, said with regard to the address of the government leader.

"Bolshevism was produced in Russia by the oppression of all popular liberty, and coalition can be founded in this country only by the oppression of all popular liberty," he said. "The coalition is a party body as any other."

Mr. Clynes complained that Mr. Chamberlain's speech would deepen class antagonism and render "further discussion to the throne and constitutional practices." He added that the labor party is a constitutional party body as any other.

Mr. Clynes argued that all the trades unions have decided to abstain from strikes in order to prevent another war. He added that if the minister failed to use the machinery of the league of nations and had not been so weak as to allow a moment of crisis they ought not to be regarded as a threat of a strike.

Mr. Thomas, labor member of parliament in the Birmingham district, said the labor party was quite ready to accept the general election issue raised by Mr. Chamberlain, namely, either to return to a coalition with all the talents and no principles or to stand the consequences of having a wicked labor government.

In political quarters Mr. Chamberlain's speech is considered in effect to have thrown very little light upon the situation, because it was practically known beforehand that he would support the coalition, and the coalition itself still must look to the premier's pronouncement at Manchester for real light on coming events.
